END OF BULL, BEGINNING OF BEAR?

2018 marks the 10th year anniversary of the Great Financial Crisis, the worst economic crisis since 1930s. We are in the late stages of the bull market as market worry about an imminent global recession.

It has been a mixed performance so far this year for global stock markets with nearly $1 Trillion wiped off emerging markets since 2018 peak.

Economic and market conditions are eerily akin to how it was back in the late 2007/early 2008. Everything was going smooth back then. Home prices soared, unemployment rate was low.

In today's market, there has been plenty of similar warnings. People have been flocking to buy their second, third property, and the government even had to come up with cooling measures to stop this frenzy.

Whether there is an imminent recession, it remains to be seen – with the US economy still going strong, while China is seemingly slowing down, amidst the rising trade tensions.
